

Coping with Stress Webinar Series

Stress is the physical and emotional pressure, tension and strain people feel when they experience difficult and frustrating situations, whether big or small. Because stress is a natural reaction to such situations, it is impossible to avoid, but you don't have to let it overwhelm you.

Too much stress can become a serious problem in a number of ways. Emotionally, feelings of panic, anxiety and helplessness are common for people under too much pressure, as are fatigue and depression. Stress also can cause or contribute to the occurrence of many physical ailments, including high blood pressure, headaches, an upset stomach, ulcers, insomnia, obesity, a weakened immune system, heart disease and stroke. The following resources can help you understand and control stress, instead of letting it control you.
